Glebe Resident Helps Australians Fight Climate Change

March 2008

Sydney University graduate and Glebe resident, Jamie Chivers has taken the fight against climate change into his own hands and created an easy way for Australians to act on their climate change concerns.

"As a nation, our largest contribution to climate change is the coal generated electricity we're consuming on a day to day basis" Jamie Chivers, founder and managing director of Easyswitch told The Glebe.

Jamie tried to switch to renewable electricity while studying but found the process confusing, with no way to directly compare the relative benefits of each supplier.

Easyswitch was Jamie's solution to help more people switch their home electricity plan to GreenPower.

Through Jamie's website residents in selected states are able to compare renewable energy retailers and switch their electricity plans without affecting their supply in anyway. Easyswitch presents all the competing companies GreenPower plans and enables you to switch through their website.

In a difficult to understand market, Jamie's website does all the calculations for you - using just your postcode and the amount of your current bill.

"Glebe residents are very aware of the dangers of Climate Change and many have already taken matters into their own hands by switching to GreenPower. I'm hoping to give residents all around Australia an easy opportunity to make a difference."

NSW has seen 7.5% of electricity users switch to GreenPower. Jamie believes this could double by the end of the year if people are given an easy opportunity to switch.
